EVOLUTION

the earth revolves people change.

Time and space become important.

On this tiny speck
amidst the galaxies
and the resounding prayers
of a multitude of men

We live
meet
share
and die.

We choose very few of our experiences friendship
being the most important.

Memories wash over us like a gentle wave.

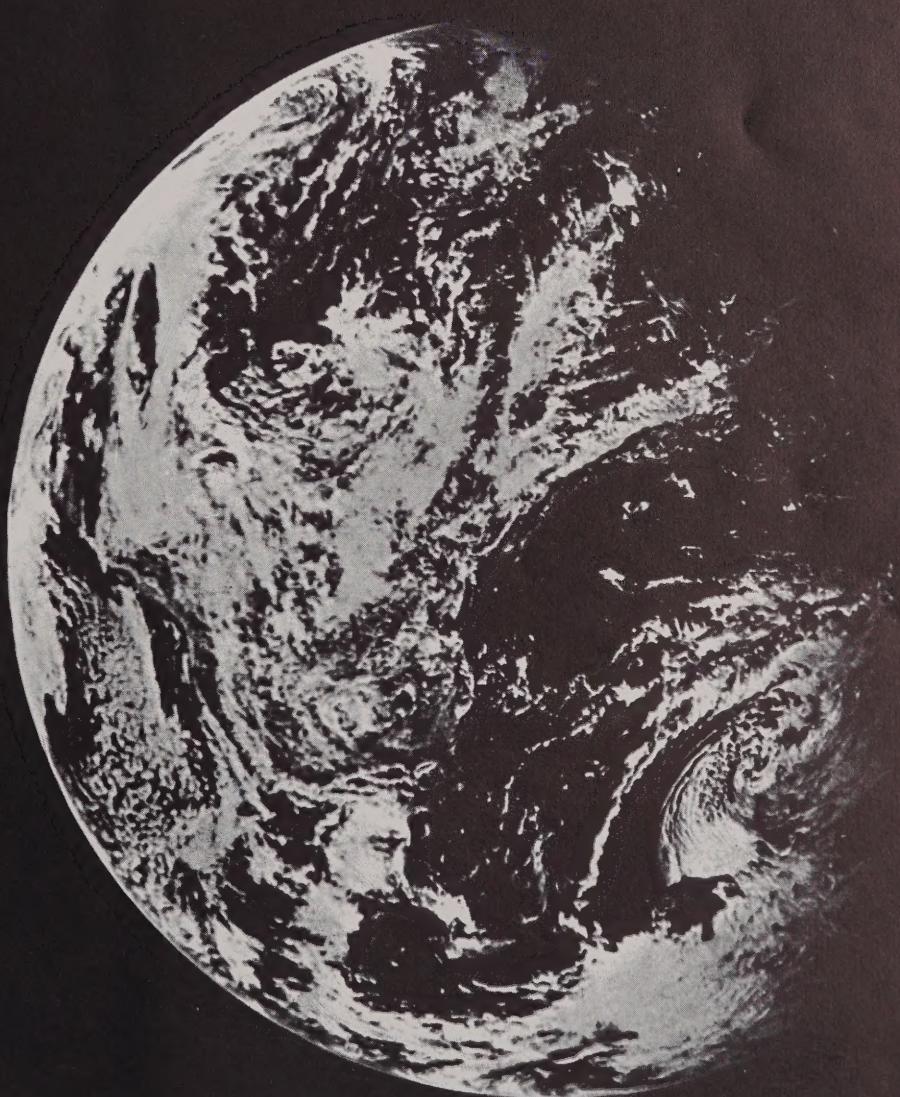

The way we live
responding to the memory of our friends is a real measure of our humanness.

It is how we treat what can never be again that makes us what we are.

This book is dedicated to two of our friends who did not come all the way with us.

One because of life and
the other because of death

Dave Mikulak and Nancy Mariner

Heil, Daley!

Sometime during the 1920's my father, Abraham Pollack, discovered that God had passed away and after a decent period of mourning he found that he was still depressed, but by that time so was the entire country, greatly. A B.A. and a world war and an Auschwitz and a Hiroshima later my father knew that God hadn't merely died, He'd committed suicide. Man, Abraham decided, is neither good nor bad but only incredibly stupid. Under one banner or another Man had murdered fellow Man for twenty thousand or so years, and it seemed rather pointless to call this right or wrong. Value labels would do little to help his German relatives who had caught the fatal "it can't happen here" syndrome, and had been there when it happened. A prophet finds truth in FORBU, and all true believers seek to establish FORBU in place of the existing GARNIB, and all those who believe in GARNIB must be done away with, whether or not doing away with is good or bad in FORBU. The missing link isn't lost, he's hiding. As to God, His corpse and His world, the meek shall indeed inherit the earth, but not until they have meekly slaughtered the opposition. Thus Abraham came to a metaphysical mental peace. His world view was simple: social justice and truth are unattainable because Man is just too dumb, he never sees what he is doing until he's done it.

But if there was no thought worth thinking about Man, there were many worth thinking about man. A human being, after all, is a package of 96¢ worth of chemicals, which is hardly impressive except for the fact that similar packages exist and they can interact. One man can seldom affect more than his immediate environment and then not for very long. There is meaning to be found in the perceptual and intellectual pleasures of art, music and literature, in the cultivation of human beings and their peculiar beauty. The only things really worth labeling are that self-perfection and love are good, hypocrisy is bad.

All this I knew, umbilically as it were. At least I knew it until I got to grammar school and learned that I was a kike, and that North America didn't exist until a white man found it, and that while Europe had nations, ministers, kings, diplomats, and Wars with Names, Africa only had tribes, chiefs and tribal skirmishes. How could you respect a people who hadn't even been able to develop the rifle for themselves? And in high school

I learned about the plagues of communism and atheism, and how slavery wasn't so bad because someone had to take care of these simple, rhythmic folk. And in high school I learned that you ought to get all you can off a girl unless you're serious about her, and then you ought to respect her more than that. And in high school I learned that niggers smell bad, are stupid, but have large dicks which they use a lot, and how chinks lie and don't respect human life except for people over 90 and how the women have crooked cunts. And in high school I learned that one always obeyed his parents, teachers, city, state, and national governments because there were some things which one simply did not question. And I saw the light and saw that it was good.

Yet adolescence is by definition a time of inconsistency for while believing all those things as I did, I was in fact an atheist, and I can't count the times I got beat up for writing an editorial suggesting that the relationship between Salem and Selma is more than that they are spelled with the same letters, and I did make love with girls I respected. Most of all I was not obedient. As a junior I became an official behavior problem and had to see the official school psychologist. At first I thought that I'd shock the old bitch and tell her about my shoplifting, cutting classes, smoking, screwing and other sordid traffic in illicit goods, until I saw that here, in this woman, was the world impinging upon my privacy. I played it straight telling her how much I loved the senile dolts who were my teachers and could tell me where, when, and how to speak and act, for indeed I had seen the light and had seen that it was good.

In high school I never acted, only reacted. I had no morality nor need of any. For America has chosen to make its young adults impotent, and they behave in kind. My adolescence was a constant search to be recognized. At home it was the rhetoric of hate for which Abraham had no use. At school it was the rhetoric of brotherhood for which my friends had no use. In all it was a time of emptiness, of feeling guilty, and dirty, and very small.

At the unlikely age of 16 I found myself a freshman at the University of Michigan. I did a lot of things instead of studying at Michigan, and not a one of them less valuable. I learned to live outside the womb. I fell in love with a girl whose beauty was exceeded only by her mental anguish; a girl so afraid of her body and sensuality, so constricted by the regulations under which freshmen women must live, and so ashamed that she lived while others died, that she ate while others starved; that the pain in her eyes almost hid their vitality. Her perception of reality was more than she could face so she ground out cigarettes in her flesh and stayed awake for four days in a row and turned finally to drugs. As I helplessly watched her systematically destroy herself, for the first time the world had outsmarted me, had gotten through, and I learned, and paid in full for the learning. For her pain, America, I blame you.

The world's next victory took the form of a polite request not to re-register at the University of Michigan. I worked as a stockboy in a Chicago ghetto dime-store during the long break from April to October, wearing the label "dropout" like a ball and chain. Sweeping the sidewalk in the early morning sunlight I would look into the black faces and the pain in their eyes almost hid their vitality, and there was something in their eyes stronger than the pain, something I had never seen before. And riding home on the bus when the rocks and bottles came flying through the windows I learned that the something else was hate. So during the lunch hour I would read the paperbacks which the store sold, by Malcolm X, James Baldwin, Dick Gregory, Martin Luther King, and Lenny Bruce, and it struck me as strange for the first time that a white boy should be working for a white owned store where all the patrons were Black. And one morning I stepped off the bus and a woman leaned out the window of her tenement and vomited on me in the humorous sense of justice which white America has never known. And I saw your light, America, and I saw that it was bad.

In October I came to Knox where the world doesn't have a chance to get through. I turned for the first time to studying. Because of all those people with hate and pain in their eyes I majored in psychology. "Black people take heart for I love you. I will give you freedom and equality." The ensuing rejection by Black students taught me that I could not give them their freedom, and that even if I could it wouldn't be worth a damn. And I discovered the depth of the racism in me. For this too, America, I blame you.

In the summer I worked in the steel mill on a furnace repair crew. In grammar school I had learned to hate, in high school I had learned to love, in college I had learned to hurt, but in the steel mill I learned fear. When you're standing three stories below a furnace, with the air at 130 degrees and everything else at around 500, with the steam so thick that you can't see out of your goggles, a hundred feet into a four foot high tunnel with a pick, shovel, and wheelbarrow between you and fresh air, and a train goes by overhead and the hot bricks around you begin to crumble and fall down your back; you learn fear. Some days I'd be so scared that I'd just stand there and whimper for fifteen minutes.

My junior year at Knox blended into the next summer in exactly the benign way Abraham used to say, "And this too shall pass." Working for McCarthy and being gassed in Grant Park and seeing Humphrey get nominated and seeing the support for Wallace, that summer, I re-learned hatred and pain in the form of bitterness. America the beautiful, whose ever-greedy industries are poisoning the air we breathe and the water we drink while the technology exists to eliminate pollution tomorrow. America the just, not finding it enough to keep Afro-Americans in slavery, to rob them of their lives, productivity and human dignity, spends half its time supporting similar oppressions around the world. America the good, after committing genocide on the American Indian deems it proper to repeat the performance on the Vietnamese people. America the pure, who teaches children to hate their own bodies, their own sexuality, replaces this need with either violence or the artificial sentimentality of the situation comedy. America the free, whose nameless, faceless bureaucrats keep close tabs on anyone deviating from the norm. America the honest, who, perhaps worst of all, covers these atrocities in the smug, smothering hypocrisy of God and the American Dream. I wear a peace symbol but it's a heavy rock on a strong leather strap.

"This country must change, dear father, its institutions, its people, its very fabric, the short-sightedness of Man notwithstanding. Some steps must be taken 'cause things can simply get no worse. Where labor unions fight a long battle for their rights and thirty years later turn around and support a demagogue of hate, surely, dear Abraham, it has come time for change. And this change can only succeed by the use of the violence which created its need. Why is it my aging, middle class parent that the 400 years of white violence is more justified than Black violence now? Tell me, how effective at social change has the tactic of appeal to the popular conscience ever been? NO, there is a revolution forming around you, it is needed, and violence as foul as it is, must be used to triumph over the greater tyranny."

There I was, telling this man who worked his way through college during the Depression, even though it took nine years to do it and he hardly got a grade above a C; telling this man who has spent 35 years in that same steel mill; this man who helped organize labor unions when companies hired scabs to club their way through the picket lines; telling this Jew who had seen six million of his people slaughtered yet opted to work sixteen hours a day in the steel mill rather than take up arms against the Germans; this man who has somehow managed to memorize most of the symphonies and operas written since the Renaissance and develop respectable tastes in art, literature, and drama. There I was telling him that things cannot get any worse. The effect, to say the least, was mellowing.

Here I had, in my nineteen years of experience and my infinite readings, discovered a set of truths so blindingly right that ten, twenty, thirty, or forty million people could correctly be sent to their deaths in its name. Have these people sinned? Yes, this point I will not relinquish. After centuries of crime, of robbing people of their personal freedom, America, do not cry out "personal freedom" when you are asked to pay for your tyranny. These people have sinned. In their smug and affluent apathy they add the overwhelming support of their silence to America's crimes. Yet this sin by and large, is one of stupidity not evil.

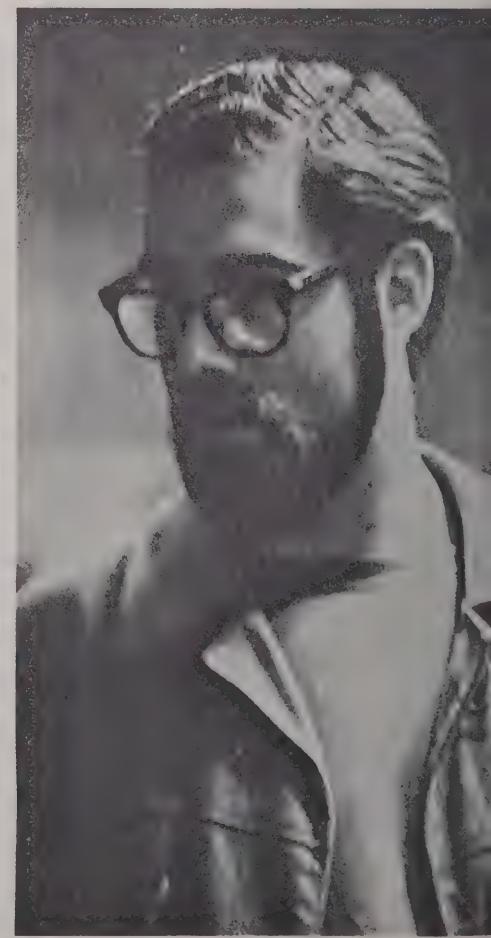

For this they should not pay with their lives. Teach them, threaten them, scare the fuck out of them, but for God's sake (aleph sholem) don't kill them, and don't rob them of their humanness. 'Cause the sum total of Man's progress on this planet is the capability to destroy it, and without significant change, that capability will soon be employed. 'Cause the universe is just one big void with a little dot of life every infinity or so, and the thought that one of those precious little dots would willfully remove itself is the most monstrous evil conceivable.

Believing these things, as I do, I must be committed to two courses of action, resistance and education. Immediately, resistance may mean going to jail; ultimately it means opposition to oppression wherever it occurs, opposition by legal means where possible, illegal means and ensuing jail where not possible; in short it means complete refusal to comply in any way with a social, economic or political institution which is practicing crimes against humanity. Education means spreading the word, explaining to idiots the evil which their idiocy perpetrates.

And if all this were to succeed beyond my wildest dreams, the world is yet left with the need for social change. Violence be omitted from the face of the earth, there is left the source of violence, competition. By competition, here, I do not mean the loving process by which two people inspire each other to greater productivity, I mean the process by which one man's physical and mental well being is obtained at the expense of another's. The adjustment of the human psyche such that this fundamental and universal sadism is no longer needed for fulfillment is my great hope for the science of psychology. But as Abraham has said more than once, "Not in my lifetime."

The process of education consists of nothing more than covering the marshlands of the mind with the fill of human experience. By that token none of us are complete; we are all evolving into a person which we may yet be. The abyss between ignorance and knowledge is not bridged any better merely as a function of the passing of time. Time, indeed, lends a neutrality unknown to position, or power, or wealth and these in and of themselves are meaningless. We are a product of revolving orders—the coming to be and the passing away of that which is sacred. The jolting change of those orders shocks us as would immersion in a northern lake in early Spring. We gasp for breath, startled by our immobility, and we do not succumb easily to newness in our world. We go on and finding ourselves renewed gain the strength to watch some dreams crumble while others are born. The darkness approaches and yet we are not diminished.

The bright and guiding star that shown over the Medieval University has burned itself nearly out. We must realize now that a new star is shining and ours is the great task to view it with gladness, not apprehension. There is a world revolving with human beings living upon it and they are in as dire need as we are to understand. The petty distinctions and the protocol and the criterias belie our stated beliefs in equality within the academic community. We are professors and students and administrators and the sum total of our achievement here will be measured by how well we educated one another; how human we became. Who's Who in America will not record it. The number of Ph.D.'s may not be a result of it. The edifices to come will not complement it. It is real and it is now and it is all that there will ever be.
